Subject: Your news article March 22, 2015

Dear Hazel,

Your article on March 22, 2015 was just brought to my attention, by someone seeking our opinion. After reading the article, we are left with many questions.

My first is: was your father truly diagnosed with PSP? By whom was the diagnosis provided?

We are tremendously excited to know that a miracle cure for a disease that brings horrific suffering on those afflicted, and heartbreak for the families affected, is available. Is there any peer-reviewed literature on this? If it were true, then we could simply pack our stuff and close the office for we would not need to operate as the leading source of real and factual information on PSP in the U.S. and beyond.

If, however, this information is not accurate and by taking this 'medicine' people with PSP are not affected, let alone cured, then that is an inexcusable abuse of platform, preying on the desperate vulnerability of people who are suffering the worst possible situation, many of whom are close to me.

My reply:

Lucas,

Funny to hear from you. I contacted you when my father was struggling with the medical "professionals" and the natural cure.

Yes of course he was diagnosed by more than one neurologist (Are you calling me a liar here?)

I have documentation and evidence to back up everything I wrote and even daily video journals. If you are truly after finding a CURE why not approach this a little differently than your less than enthusiastic email.

In fact I am surprised you are not more asking me how my father was able to reverse his PSP symptoms.

Why not set up a meeting and educate yourself. Surely you can take this further than I did as I am simply a daughter who loved her father more than life itself and who was basically duped by the doctors who sounded much of the tone of your email.

Should you wish to work with me and gain better understanding of this miraculous findings. I'd love to entertain that idea but if this is simply to insult and quiet THE TRUTH, than you can go off and well something I am too lady like to say to you.

Grow up Lucas, if you are in the business of CURING psp, this is a hot lead as I have obviously accomplished more than you have been profiting to do. Aren't you interested?

Oh, that's right, you are probably getting your pay check from pharmaceutical supporters and therefore to your income, my information is a threat. Well, then so be it.

Shame on you for pretending to help people. You didn't help my father, you made it worse by your pretending to help the cause and in turn you're hurting it.

Hazel

His final words:

Hi Hazel,

Thank you for responding. I would like to extend an apology for the insulting tone of my email to you. It was a little rude of me, but I wrote it like that on purpose, for this reason: there are many agents in the digital world that seek to spread false information and take advantage of vulnerable communities, and I felt compelled to test you to understand your intentions. Again, I apologize that I have offended you, but I am now satisfied that you are legitimate and have done your research.

I will be bringing your article and findings up in our meetings here with our VP-Scientific Affairs and our Science Advisory Board, and we will look into it. I must say though, that as a trusted organization we are unable to recommend therapies unless they are FDA approved, and come from a rigorous peer-reviewed scientific process. Yes we want to cure PSP, but we are bound by rules by which we must abide.

I thank you for your honesty and candor, and your amazing results with your own father.

Best regards,
